

my ★psychotically deranged★ manifesto:

a treatise against the human race, which I have begun writing during the 2nd week (March 25, 2020) of the national lockdown due to the Coronavirus, SARS-CoV2, COVID-19 global pandemic.

 please acknowledge how special I am to have been alive during the SARS-CoV2, COVID-19 global pandemic of 2020.

Humanity...Oh! The Humanity.

Truer words have not been spoken. Oh...The humanity. The repulsive blight on our dear Earth. The seat of all known consciousness embedded in the demonic monkey brains of over a billion walking, talking, electrical meat puppets. The species which oppresses itself out of boredom and hate. The species equipped with the diabolical rationality that justifies its cruelty and sadism against both itself and all other forms of life.

Oh...the humanity...What a boring and disgusting colony of vermin.

Does anyone know what it means to be human? No. They don't. And anyone who says that they do is a charlatan selling something or trying to increase their brand engagement (wink wink). No one knows. Least of all the profaned masses undulated with the brainwashed programming poured into the overflowing troughs erected and dispelled by our "leaders" and "experts" who have given themselves the generational and wealth backed, self-appointed right to authority, power, influence, and control. And we certainly can't count on the fucks with PhDs writing their boring, superficial, milquetoast thoughts about society from their My Parents Love Each Other and They Supported Me Throughout My Academic Career suburban fucking teenage bedroom windows. Fuck them. If THEY can write their shitty opinions on existence and have the gall to think that they have the keys to divine wisdom, well then fuck it...so can I.

I might not be an expert on KISSING ASS and CONFORMING to the standards of my bourgeois peers, but like everyone else, I'm an expert on humanity.

I'm an expert on being human, how to engage with them, and how to live in their world...

Their fucking sickening hell world. And what I've learned is this:

It is me, by myself, against the entire rest of the species.

And what I think it means to be human is that it all comes down to primal and vicious selfishness.

I'm Better Than You:

Children don't realize that they are separate individuals until they are only 6-7 months old. This is critical and it illustrates the innate selfishness ingrained into our being from the moment we are brought into this doomed existence, and which, never actually really leaves.

Eventually, it seems we come to learn that we are each separate, enclosed individuals.

However, it is only through displacing this innate selfishness, this embedded sense of selfish entitlement, and through the application of rationality, logic, and by reflectively understanding emotions until we can use them to construct the lines and boundaries that separate "me" and "them," does it seem we learn that the entire external is not an extension of "me."

This sense of egocentrism, self-centeredness; this uncanny disposition of each and every human to believe, for a large part of their life, that the world does indeed, revolve around them, that many people need to be taught that it does not revolve around them, that many individuals believe that through thought alone, they can influence the world, that many individuals believe that although they work 9-5 wage jobs or are literal nobodies with no modicum of power, that they can alter world events through "manifestation," "spells," etc. These are all traces of an inborn inclination to believe that the world is literally just an appendage of "you."

It would be idealistic, optimistic, and hopeful to believe that all the above is true. That using thought alone, one can change the world. Of course, action follows thought, or at least, some actions do. For the large part, however, one cannot use thought to induce world war or prayer to bring about global peace. In any case, I'm just using these examples to illustrate how individuals believe that they have some entitlement to altering the external environment and their difficulty in accepting the potentiality of being imprisoned inside the enclosed, cut-off circuit of their little freak minds.

This selfishness, the bizarre entitlement humans seem to feel about the external world and everyone and thing in it plays itself out obnoxiously in human society and is on full display to anyone who is looking. It is the basis for all group identity, all familial and friendly connections, it is the basis for work, for pleasure, and the continuation of the species itself.

It is the basis for the selfish instinct of (my) Your Survival.

I Know Better Than You:

How this works is that each person will only care about others so long as those special others will ensure to a greater extent, their own survival. And because of the fucking freakish consciousness of humankind, this survival isn't limited to mere physical survival. The survival of one individual must mean the survival of their physical form, yes. Their DNA? To be sure. But it also includes their beliefs, their worldview, their "creations," their interests, their "culture", their "nationality," their "country," their "favorite bands and actors and movies," the survival of their memories, the survival of their thoughts, their stupid fucking jokes, and so on and on and on and on, oh my god, it never ends with these fucking people.

Let's take (You), for example. (You) have your preferences, your beliefs, your worldview, what you think is right and wrong, blah blah blah. Of course, you're not going to befriend someone who doesn't share at least some of these, right? Jesus, you'd have nothing to talk about! No, no. You will find others who share those views, who mirror those views back to you, who enhance them, who ensure the survival of those views, or whatever. Maybe you and your friends will come together and develop a better way to spread your culture, your beliefs, your ideas, and thereby, increase the chance of their survival, their proliferation, and (hopefully, though, who wants to admit it?) the dominance, of your ideas, worldview, culture, and so on.

Now, let's say that you believe in X, and of course, those other fucks believe in Y. And I won't even bring into play that a great many other people believe in A, B, C, D, E, F, G, H, I, J, K, L,...

No. It would take too much energy for your feeble fucking ape brain to process and contemplate the variety of ideas and beliefs and differences out there, so we'll just do it simply:

It's Us vs. Them.

X vs. Y.

Good vs. Evil

Truth vs. Lie

Real vs. Fake

Beautiful vs. Ugly

Smart vs. Stupid

Rich vs. Poor

East vs. West

North vs. South

Wrong vs. Right

Dead vs. Alive

Me vs. You and so on.

HAHAHAHAHA

YOU FUCKING IDIOTS.

Y believes in things that X doesn't and Y is so sure of its own validity and truth, that it doesn't really think that X, and therefore, the people who believe in X have any credibility.

This is a threat (to X)...

And what do psychotic deranged hairless hybrid alien-primates do when they feel threatened? They hate.

Both sides will hate each other in a sickening display of a kind of revolting and sadistic psychic intercourse. X will notice how all Y believers are stupid and ugly and live in this weird part of the country where only fucking losers and no-life imbeciles just so randomly happen to live. Y followers will believe that X followers are simply misguided fools, if only they could see the truth of Y! How sad for them, those poor pitiful bastards. Y believers are so merciful, aren't they? Don't you appreciate how merciful they are not to hate you outright? Just a little passive-aggression. Just a little demeaning comment here and there. They know they're right, so why would they have to insult you? Hm...

This process of identifying and then demonizing an OTHER is the ESSENCE OF HUMAN EXISTENCE.

The process of demonizing an OTHER is so intrinsic to human behavior. Was it always this way? I hope not. One of humanity's most preferred pastimes is to rally around their beloved object of hate. They unite themselves around hate. Without the object of their hate, they would have nothing. No meaning, no opposition, no behavior to enact in opposition to the OTHER. How will They ever know that they're Right, that they're Good, if they haven't a nemesis who is Wrong and Bad? Their "correctness" and their "goodness," would be utterly meaningless without their evil OTHER who embodies all the horror that mankind is capable of imagining. This is probably obvious to any human. The other, though, is always a threat. Whether that threat is to hegemony, lifestyle, religion, or brand preference.

♥ THE OTHER IS ALWAYS A THREAT. ♥

♥ THE OTHER IS ALWAYS A THREAT TO YOU. ♥

♥ IF THEY ARE NOT WITH YOU, THEY ARE A THREAT. ♥

♥ IF THEY ARE NOT WITH YOU, THEY ARE AGAINST YOU. ♥

[I'm in a different mood now and it's a different day. The quarantine is ongoing.
In fact, it's been extended. We're on day...I don't remember].

So, the point is that all ideologies, all relationships, all human efforts are focused on extending the self. And all human behavior is focused on self-survival. Everyone is used as a tool to advance self-survival. Of primary importance to humanity is social status and Being Accepted by The Group, because The Group ensures your survival and people will do just about anything to be accepted by The Group.

The more power, the more authority, the more advantages The Group has, the more cruel, inhuman, and sadistic will be the hoops in which a hopeful initiate will have to jump. This is part of the explanation for how things like "Jeffery Epstein" are allowed to happen. Those in positions of authority and power prove themselves worthy of such power and authority by committing the most ruthless and abominable acts against mankind because not only does it prove loyalty, the possession of a personality so lethally power-driven and ambitious that it will gladly hurt others and cross ethical boundaries that distinguish predator from prey, but it also confirms that the candidate can live with themselves after committing such violent brutality, thinks nothing of and can smile after assaulting, killing, and ruining another human, and most importantly, it creates a visceral distinction between us (the profane, the masses, the peasants, the objects to be used by the elite, the hordes of seething sweaty flesh dying in front of computers all around the world) and them (sacred, worthy, powerful, rich, the ones who merit power and influence over the world, the ones allowed to be human, etc.).

Committing acts of cruelty even BINDS humans together more tightly. Expressing disdain, violating, and maiming another human, preferably a weaker, demonized, "bad" and "wrong" human, provides a glue which unites the opposing group, strengthens their friendships, provides a fertile ground for a sense of solidarity, bound by a shared secret, etc. Friendships thrive on mutually shared hate.

Further sad news related to this is that human-human predation is part of evolution and it accelerates human society. It is not through love and compassion that human civilization develops, but through killing, cruelty, withholding of resources, demonizing the vulnerable and dehumanizing the weak.

You might not like it, but this is what everyone does in their daily lives, taken to its logical conclusion and it is only through delusion, conceit, and self-deception, that anyone believes that they are somehow "better" than inflicting pain and abusing an Other who is weak, vulnerable, and at their mercy. You do it every day- because you have to, because you can't help them, because of whatever excuse and justification you use to rationalize why THEY deserve to be treated poorly and YOU DON'T.

Sure, you may not be a murderer or a violent criminal, but I don't think I have to list the offenses that each person commits daily to hurt others, to restrict others, to censor others, to mock, belittle, and shame others. Every infliction of emotional pain is an infliction of physical pain. Every instance of othering, every instance of objectification, every instance of dehumanization, every instance of treating others as SUBHUMAN. Treating others as LESS THAN YOU- is an instance of killing. You kill a part of a person when you degrade them. You kill a part of a person when you insult and bully them. You kill a part of a person when you see their suffering and meet it with apathy. And when you do that, those people who you throw to the side like they're fucking garbage, end up hurt and alone, and often, with no one to protect them or help them continue to survive. And that's when they're easiest to be preyed upon by the "Actual Predators" that make the news. We live in a culture that supports predators, because every single fucking human is a psychotic predator, looking out only for themselves, looking at other humans as either prey or fellow predator. You are either ONE OF US (predator) or the OTHER (prey-threat) unless you drop out of the human race completely.

People only need other people to ensure their survival (friendship, family). If they didn't, we'd have already killed each other off. And this goes for most things. It goes for the lists of dichotomies I listed earlier. All dualisms NEED each other to survive. There can be no beauty without ugliness, there can be no life without death, there can be no good without evil. The human is trapped in the confines of this dualistic prison, and they fucking replicate it every instance of their lives. They couldn't function without it if they tried. Not only does it stem from Dead vs. Alive, Dark vs. Light, but it stems from Me vs. You because Me (certain. alive) vs. You (uncertainty. death).
GOD... ITS SO FUCKING BORING TO SEE THROUGH YOU ALL SO EASILY.

To succeed in the human world, you have to submit yourself to someone else's version of what it means to be alive. And if you don't, other groups vying for dominance in the world will shame, beat, humiliate, exploit, degrade, dehumanize, berate, and tear you apart just to remake you in the image of who they think you should be, which will likely be in the form of perfect group conformity, or demonic evildoer, in which case, if you're unlucky enough to be considered the later, no amount of cruelty and punishment will ever be justly meted out to you. There is no escaping the violence of mankind.

And who decides? People like Jeffrey Epstein. People who are so vile and ruthless that they're happy and willing to tear down millions, oversee the deaths of millions just to have their chance at immortality and power. People willing to go to the furthest extremes to PREY ON THE WEAK.
Why are any of you so fucking shocked????

[Day 22 of Quarantine (08/04/2020). I haven't been writing much because it's hard to think about how vicious is mankind].

To summarize :
Every human has an instinct for self-survival, self-preservation. Because of human consciousness, this instinct gets perverted. Self-survival for humanity does not include just one's physical self. It extends to everything that a person defines themselves by. Other people who conform to the self-image of a person get more or less adopted into the extended concept of "self" because this group ensures the longevity and preservation of the self. People who do not conform to an individual's self-image are treated as prey or threats.

Altruism, compassion, love, friendship: the loftiest ideals cherished by humankind. Sadly, these are all exercises in (un)conscious self-deception. All these goals are really selfishness in disguise. People use others for self-gain and empowerment. So long as you ensure my survival, I will ensure yours (love, friendship). So long as I can use you to congratulate myself on how giving and how selfless I am and to enhance my social standing within my own superior, dominating group, I will be compassionate and altruistic towards you.

Of course, we like to think that we chose to who we extend our compassion, who receives our gestures of altruism. But it's evident that it's best to be compassionate towards those who live in extreme powerlessness, as this often creates one of the most generous and caring images one can have. The more impoverished, the more destitute, the more degraded is the prey, the more laudable, the more profound, and the more heroic is the predator who, rather than exploiting and killing, when they so easily could, doles out their pithy compassion and kindness instead. Wow.

This is a major attraction to charity. It's a major reason why the elite hasn't killed us all yet. The inequities make gestures of kindness and charity so much more powerful, visceral. Truly heroic. The rich need the poor so that their luxury and wealth and privilege have meaning. Those making charitable donations need those poor, sad recipients so that their financial excess and their ability to even give charity, has meaning. So that they can write a check to congratulate and feel good about themselves for being selfless, giving, and making the world a better place. [This goes back to the prison of duality].
So that they can regroup at their country club and talk about how giving they are, how those poor bastards smiled and cried when they took out their wallets and wrote that check. Oh, and you have to be philanthropic at this level, otherwise, you will be the defiled enemy, you're not consenting to the conformity of the group, you're not advancing the continuation to the image of wise-benevolence of the rich, the image that they deserve all that wealth and influence because they know better than you.

On a more micro level, feudal peasants are trained to do this to each other all of the time. Usually, this is centered around simple materialistic conformity (as per the agenda of the elite). People in school get bullied into conforming to the norm or conforming to the standards and tribal behavior of whichever group they're in. Sometimes, bullying is even a force for good, where one is bullied into making a better choice, or bullied into being less of a loser, for example. However, we have to ask who decides what's good, who decides what the stereotypical standard of a group member should look like. Who decides what is loser behavior and what isn't? This is where that overflowing trough of brainwash programming I mentioned earlier comes in. Suck up the dualisms, the oppositions, the Me vs. You, Good vs. Evil, the psychotic black and white moralism and judgmental bullshit and then please go out, and find an enemy target to hate.

Normally, this peer-pressure is condensed into strengthening a hyper-conformist consumerist identity. The point is to conform to the group that ensures the reproduction of others who will continue wearing the same clothes, buying the same products, and doing the same behaviors as you. To consume and to produce objects and material to be consumed, hopefully by as many people as possible, is very close to the absolute height of what a human can achieve.

When others do not conform, or when they transgress conformity, they are often punished, unless they can accumulate enough social capital and status (by assimilating more powerful others into their extended self) to transcend the mold completely. This is exceedingly rare, but when it does happen, it results in a new mold in which others will be forced to herd into and conform.

Why is this a problem? For me, it's a problem because I believe this is a base, primitive, and stupid expression of human capability. It's a glaring vulnerability in human nature and life in general, just waiting to be exploited. It limits what we as a species can achieve. We have effectively reduced ourselves into little more than parasitical leeches, consuming other's waste and then ejecting our waste to be consumed by others...We basically now live in a culture of human-centipede style coprophiliacs.

This has largely been carried out by our deference to the most ruthless, most cunning, by the most creatively Machiavellian of our species. It seems to me that people have forgotten that humans are top predators and that we prey on all forms of life, including ourselves. Because of human weakness and because of each individual's desperation to survive, many people will cling to a paternalistic, cruel, and unforgiving "alpha" and form a group around supporting them. The weakness inherent in each individual is perverted by its desire to deceive itself of perceiving its own weakness. Predators who are willing to hurt and maim others who are weak while providing assurance and safety to those who abide by the predator's rules, eliminate the possibility of perceiving one's own weakness. Hurting others empowers the group inflicting said harm. It means that they are stronger, better, more resilient, more...whatever it is that they hold dear. They can only embody those ideals by committing violence against another who represents all opposition to what they believe themselves to be.

There can be no culture and no group and no conformity without creating oppositions, for the competition between oppositions creates existential meaning for both sides. Even individual identity itself has been reduced to dichromatic opposition. "They believe Y and I'm not one of them, so I do not believe Y." So, apparently, humans will forever be waging a war between us and them, good and evil, rich and poor.

[Day 24 of Quarantine (09/ 04/ 2020)]

Not only do I resent humanity for its addiction to duality, but I also resent humanity for its unbearable and relentless attempts to prove how special and how unique and how wonderfully magnificent each and every person is. Especially you, reader. I'm sure you've gone to great lengths to prove how much better than others you are, how much more important and intelligent. Again, this goes back to the totally backward conception of reality possessed by mankind. People can only be "better" if someone else is worse. And the lengths people go to prove just how bad others are, just so they can seem better, by comparison, is truly despicable. When people go out of their way to belittle another individual or go after a group (obviously...I'm different, because I'm going after our entire species, not one single group 😊), it's usually to prove how much better they are compared to that group. It's just endless predation, except because humans are "social" animals, meaning that they can't exist without socially manipulating other humans into supporting their continued survival, most of us prey on other's ideas, thoughts, culture, worldview. Unless of course, you get to the top of the absolutely pathetic hierarchy of human nature, where you can just order the deaths of millions in the name of War Against [Insert Your Make-Believe Reason Here].

We are so smug in our self-assured knowledge and have such hubris to think we're the center of everything. We destroy each other just so we can seem the better consumer, the better person who conforms ideally to the prototypical member of a consumption tribe. We tell ourselves that lofty ideals like love and compassion are the ultimate in what humanity can achieve, only because we are impotent at transcending dualities, because we can't face the fact that we are little more than worms, in our worm colonies, trying to make sense out of the senseless. And...if love and compassion are the height of what it means to be human, then triply fuck humanity because there is so much more that we could achieve. Love and compassion are expressed on a mini-scale and they only go so far. You can't be compassionate and loving to billions, or millions. But if we all loved our little tribes; wouldn't things get better? No. Because the other tribes would get pissed off that you didn't love each other the way they do. They would come over and try to convert you into loving each other the way THEY do. We all know how that ends! (War). And of course, there would undoubtedly be a member of your tribe who you don't actually love, and what? Will you build resentment by pretending to love them? Perhaps. Most probably, you'll reject the member who you can't love. You'll bully them into being more Like You, you'll contact your friends and assault them maybe, you'll browbeat them into obedience. So, love only works for people who conform. You can only love someone who ensures your survival. And that's not really love. Maybe it's self-love, masquerading as an ability to love someone else just to assuage your use of them.

The number of delusions required to function as a human is probably infinite. In my opinion, human consciousness is psychotic and we are all schizos murmuring to ourselves, forcing sense upon the senselessness, trying to force structure onto chaos, trying to find meaning in absolute meaninglessness. Then, once we do that, we're like missionaries who are compelled to convert others into believing our own made-up nonsense. As if convincing others and getting others to believe and corroborate that we're right makes our beliefs more real, concrete, and more indisputably true. And in a sense, it does. When we can form a group who all agrees that "Yes, we are all Right, aren't we? I'm right, and you're right! Because we agree on the same thing 😊." Then we all feel good and smug and comfortable. What more could anyone want in life? Everyone is validating your belief so really, how could it be wrong? Why, if they don't agree, they just don't understand! If they don't agree, they're going to burn in hell! If they don't agree, they're possessed, if they don't agree, they're evil, or they're just fucking stupid.

And of course, now you feel special. You know better than them! And those sacred truths you possess, they give you so much meaning. They make everything you do so important, so worthwhile. You've undoubtedly created a whole story to confirm how special and how important is your existence.

This is so depressing and bad, right? Or, this sounds like a 15-year-old with too much angst. Or it sounds like a dumbass, a bitter old bitch. Have all the judgments you like. It doesn't matter to me because I just can't take it anymore. I can't take having to hate someone and to agree that someone else is bad and to agree that someone else is evil just to be accepted and fit in with a human social group. I can't take it. I can't take the reduction of what it means to be human, to where all that matters is some eternal war between Absolute Good and Absolute Evil, when neither actually exist. We are literally TRAPPED in these dualisms and it's unbearable for me. I feel so alone in seeing them all as the two sides of the same coin, in seeing them perfectly balanced and united; as being one and the same.

There is no evil outside of the evilness of man. It is man who names evilness, who identifies it. Man decides what is good and he decides what is bad, and then he plays like he's innocent, like it isn't from his own mind that he concocts it. That he is not the one who envisions all evils. He decides what is evil, and he is, therefore, the bringer of it. Without man to name evil, it simply would not exist.

You can blame demons, you can blame “Satan”, for all the horror your heart and mind are capable of imagining, but is it not you who envisions such evil? Is it not YOU who imagines the pits of hell in which your “evil” enemies will be thrown? Is it not YOU who feels satisfaction in knowing that those who disagree with you, or that those who you feel are “evil” will be punished? Is it not you who judges who is good from evil? By creating absolute goodness, one simultaneously begets absolute evilness. By naming beauty, one names ugliness. It is man who creates these concepts and so it is he who brings them into existence. All of us are guilty and none of us are innocent. We must accept the fact that WE bring EVIL into the world. We need to stop turning a blind eye to the EVIL that we inflict on each other and MAYBE then, we can recover from the inhumanity that we’ve allowed to fester on our earth like an untreated and now gangrenous wound.

[Day ?? of Quarantine (16/ 04/ 2020). They’ve extended it until May 11, on which date, hopefully, this will be over. We’ll see. I feel apathetic toward mankind recently. My hatred comes only out of love and when I feel nothing, it’s because I’m simply exhausted from caring...]

Ever since the first of our species perceived and became cognizant that the sun (light) brings warmth and vegetation and that the night (dark) brings cold and blindness, humanity has been confined to duality. I imagine that without this simple awareness, we would have never evolved and that there would be no human civilization at all. Clearly, duality has it’s “advantages,” if that’s what you want to call them. If you’re proud of human civilization and feel a sense of awe in what we do to each other and the planet, you can thank duality. If, on the other hand, you’re anything like me, you might see civilization as, if not downright “evil”, but as repressive, limiting, vicious, and you might see human nature as being inherently sadistic and both physically and psychologically violent.

Humankind has walked this planet for 200,000 years or so, or maybe 5 million, depending on which result on Google you’re looking at. And this (what is all around you), is all we have to show for it. Why is this? Why haven’t we done more? Why has the ideal human become Psychopathic Billionaire Con Artist? Why are we still allowing others to live in poverty, to die from sicknesses that could be easily cured? Why are we still driving automobiles? Why are there no habitable bases on the moon?

Duality and human nature are the culprits, the enemy, the vile, demonic scapegoat. Either human nature is incapable of transcending duality or humankind is so addicted to shaping his reality to fit the dichromatic mold, that it simply cannot transcend it.

This isn’t to say that we should not be able to identify threats. Of course, so long as there is life, there will be the inclination to commit acts of “evil.” Unfortunately, or fortunately, the only way to truly eradicate evil is to annihilate humanity. Certainly, there will be no longer be evil in the galaxy once there is no one left to commit and identify it. I also recognize the need to “use others” to compare ourselves relative to them. Without doing this, none of us would have an identity, no one would know what makes them different from another. Unfortunately, however, it is my view that if the only way to identify who I am is by regulating others to mere objects from which I extract characteristics to compare myself against, I would rather remain in my home and never engage without another human again. I prefer to renounce my humanity and my existence if it means I must categorize and box in another.

These two aspects of human kind, whether innate or brainwashed into us, also help explain why humanity is intrinsically “capitalist.” We “own” ourselves, we are the “masters” of ourselves. We have to “use” others to define ourselves. Groups/tribes become literal resources to be exploited. I won’t get too much into this because political people are like rabid hounds waiting to tear apart anyone who so much as slightly disagrees with or offends them. In any case, there is an automatic process by which people use others as objects to enhance and identify themselves. This is exactly why humanity is so fucking wrong. This automatic process has been taken to the extreme and we have ALLOWED it.

🌟 YOU ARE NOT INNOCENT. ✨

✨ YOU ARE COMPLICIT. 🌟

I'm human. You're subhuman:

For over a century, if not longer, duality has been the binary code on which all of us are running our consciousness, and because of this, our consciousness has been reduced to that of a functionally intelligent bot. The functions which are now limited consciousness are capable of performing are:

♥️ Consume. Produce. Dehumanize Yourself. Dehumanize Others. ♥️

For most peasants, consciousness has been purposefully restricted and limited through duality (and by extension, the conception of time as linear). Dualistic thinking is inherently dehumanizing because it automatically generates an oppositional, lesser, antagonizing force. So long as duality is the base of human perception of reality, there will be other humans who are perceived as Subhuman and therefore, deserving of punishment, violence, and suffering. Dualistic thinking also sustains rote behavior functioning and it ensures simplistic binary thinking. In modern society especially, the addictive reliance on dualism to keep everything running is truly frightening.

To put it simply, humanity is cruel, selfish, and violent. It prefers when the most violent, most cruel, and most selfish of its kind direct the trajectory of its tribe and group. Because of this, we have elites at the top of the hierarchy who exacerbate inhumanity and ruthlessness. There is a “trickle-down” effect of the methods of dehumanization for the sake of consumption, obedience and control. And we really cannot forget that mankind uses others as subhuman objects to enhance and compare themselves on an individual level and that it's not some “other” who enforces dehumanization, rather, it's that dehumanizing ourselves and others has been rewarded and encouraged by the elites who we have been allowed to take the helm of our civilization. Duality is a seemingly inborn vulnerability of mankind and has been exploited by the more ruthless, predatory of our species to ensure their survival.

We dehumanize ourselves so it's easier to dehumanize others.
We dehumanize others so that others may dehumanize us.
A virtuous circle in which we all remain conveniently oppressed.

In modernity, dualisms take on a new color. It's not just about good vs. evil, it's mostly about me vs. you. Production and consumption are centered around this (this is the binary code that “life” is based on, or at least the one that has been brainwashed into us, although it is entirely fake).

When advertising realized that it could create insecurities to sell products, it found a way to “hack humanity.” (I vomited in my mouth while typing that). Insecurities and an obsessive, hyper-fixation on self are now one of the easiest ways to ensure control and dominance. Creating insecurities about the self turns humans into superficial bots that glitch and loop over insolvable problems. “Are my teeth white enough, am I pretty enough, do I need to buy more skincare products, am I skinny enough, are my muscles big enough, do I need to buy more clothes?” These are some of the typical questions that consumers need to hyper-focus on and which become the jail bars of an imprisoned consciousness. Consumption also exploits humanity's vulnerability towards using others to measure themselves against. Instead of learning from others or being open to divergent ways of thinking or being, it becomes a competition. Others become walking advertisements for products that should be consumed and they become rivals in the competition for Perfect Ideal Tribal Member Consumer.

Dualities disunite humanity, increase psychopathy and demand the dehumanization of others for the betterment of oneself. Duality also helps sustain the masochistic nature of human society. While the most psychopathic predators on the top exercise sadism, the masses are brainwashed into machoism so that the harm and abuse inflicted on them becomes desired and even seemingly deserved. It also helps create a situation where the masses cannot perceive themselves without a master to dominate them. Societal masochism allows people to hurt themselves through the botified-dehumanizing thinking I mentioned in the previous paragraph. It encourages the infliction of small-scale sadism and the dehumanization on others, “they aren't as good as me, so they don't deserve fair treatment. They don't believe the right thing, so they deserve to be punished.” These forms of thinking are one of the ways how the elite regulate peasants into automated subhuman bots and it is how they maintain their control over them.

Our pathetic reliance on duality opens the doors for all forms of oppression and self-confinement.

Dualistic thinking is a weak form of consciousness that exacerbates one of the basest forms of consciousness, which is a hyper-fixation on the self and the reduction of others into objects that are used to decorate, enhance, or detract from the self.

Life is dependent on violence and war.
Stop war by discontinuing life.
Return to the serenity of nonexistence.

The real answer and the one I keep avoiding to express is that the easiest solution to any of this is the total destruction of the human race. And not only that, but we would have to destroy the entire fucking planet, just to save it from ever evolving life again. LIFE IS LITERALLY THE ENEMY. Life cannot even exist without death. Life is the true fucking anomaly in the universe and it is really more like a cancerous mass originating from earth. If we were to colonize Mars, we wouldn't be spreading "life", we would be spreading death. This conclusion...no one likes and no one wants to entertain because it contradicts the gruel slop of morality and meaning spooned into all of our minds and which people spend their lives defending and believing just to bar the possibility of perceiving the total meaninglessness of their consciousness existence, which they possess for literally no reason. Just make up a reason! It feels good to have a reason for why you think you're aware of all of this. You'll believe anything to make yourself feel better. In captivity, a prisoner will come to believe anything to alleviate the terror of their confinement. This is you. You are the prisoner.

There is something so intrinsically wrong with human nature, something so abhorrent and so jaw-droppingly fucked up. It's not shocking that humans commit atrocities against themselves once you realize that war is humanity's (and life's) natural state. The instinct to commit violence and the invention of reasons to justify wars (small, individual wars, not just large-scale national wars) is the essence of life, and human consciousness has made the battlefield super-terrestrial. It's a war of literally everything: ideas, beliefs, worldviews, ideologies, modes of production, where to live, how to live, what to look like, how to speak, how to wave your hand. NOTHING IS OUTSIDE OF THE ETERNAL WAR. If we were to remove the instinct for violence and war, we would remove the very instinct to survive, and this is the real point and I'm sorry it's not self-assuring and uplifting, but the only way to stop war, to stop violence, to stop cruelty, inequality, to stop all of the things so many of us like to smugly deem Wrong and Bad, all of it can only cease to exist by eliminating life from the universe.

Otherwise, we will have to end the eternal war that "nature" forcibly conscripts us into engaging. To do this, we will need technology to dictate our evolution and to no longer leave it in the hands of the bastard nature that wants only to consume and eject and recycle death.

We will have to remove ourselves from nature. Pull out the white flag and surrender, bow out of its eternal war, leave the confinement of the duality it tries to impose on us by confining us in the liminal space between life and death. We will have to reject nature completely.

The End of Mankind:

To leave nature will require that we shed and replace the “natural” state of man. We will have to usurp the authority over anything that nature dictates and imposes upon us: editing our genes, using artificial wombs, augmenting biology at the supramolecular scale, creating nanomaterial capable of artificially terraforming the earth and other planets. All that nature “creates” must be replaced.

Nature must be regulated to a legacy version of reality.

(The argument can be made that we are already cyborgs and that we are already “unnatural.” It seems to me that we have been on course to develop a synthetic intelligence since the dawn of our species. The capacity for inventing objects that alter our reality and modify our relationship to one another, and our environments have been long going on. Man doesn’t and cannot exist outside of nature, everything he does and embodies is part it. Though I write that we have to replace it, there can be no “true” escape from nature, only the reorganization and reprocessing of it).

Individually segmented consciousness must be done away with. There can no longer be distinctions between “me and you.” We must share and have access to a universal consciousness that supersedes the tiny cell of self. We must do away with the concept of self completely and move beyond our infantile reliance on objectifying and using others to determine who we are as individuals. In fact, the entire concept of individuality has to be made optional, not enforced without escape.

We can transcend the confines of duality by building our own a trinity:

~~Organic Life, Synthetic Life, NonLife.~~

Elongating life and taking control of our deaths will diminish the powerful and extremely imprisoning (and illusory) duality of life and death. Preventing disease and advancing medical science will allow humans to decide how they age. By developing the ability to alter the representation of the physical self through augmented reality filters and digital environments, we can transcend the limitations of self and experience consciousness through the projection and embodiment of Others. Using DNA modification, we can erase the ability of extremism, violence, and terror and thus move beyond the need for individual threat detection altogether. We can use advanced predictive algorithms for large scale threat analyses and thus ease the wasteful burden of such processing power on mankind, and thereby restrain the tendency towards relying on biases that prop of prejudices and distort pattern recognition.

Once we create a universal hivemind, where telepathy, mentation and emotional synchronization and the ability to enter the minds of others is created, and where an objective consensus reality is determined through the millions, if not billions, of sensors around and inside of the earth and around and inside of our bodies, we will be able to fully ascend the limitations of individual consciousness. We will be able to see our reality as objectively as possible while inhibiting so many of the biases that lead to confrontation, misunderstanding, narrow-mindedness, and war. We will be able to perceive life and existence from an almost God-like view: a global, even super-terrestrial view, where the mutual reliance and the symbiosis of all forms of life are visible to all. No longer will we be regulated to thinking only of the self and how our selves measure up to and against other selves. We will more easily avoid ensnarement of group-think and the arrogance of assuming superiority over other groups. Instead, we can create an existence where a concept self is just an option, a temporary form of entertainment, just one way to perceive reality, instead of the default, inescapable view. Clinging to ideas of the self means clinging to a version of reality where everything outside of the self must either be assimilated into the self or killed off. This is unsustainable and has outlived its necessity, (if it ever really had one- I would say not.).

No matter what, as users of reality, creating a hivemind that renders the embodiment of an individual self non-compulsory will greatly reduce the need for duality, as will the methuselarity, which will reduce the degree to which death and mortality cage and color mankind’s perception of existence.

If we are to continue existence and continue to hope that Tomorrow Will Be A Better Day, we must fight against the urge to view others and other forms of life as “less” than human, as “less” than our individual selves. The entire basis for eternal war must be lost. Humanity has a chance to transcend the limits of itself, to leave humanity altogether, along with its abominable wars, greed, self-centeredness, apathetic cruelty, sadism, and harm, and to become something more than human.

Something unequivocally beyond nature. To save humanity and other forms of life from humanity itself, humanity must become something else. We have allowed ourselves to become what we are now: a species continually devouring itself. A species that cannot survive without hating another of its kind. A species that cannot enact its own methods of preservation because of its fundamentally limited scope of perception (i.e. the concept of self, linear time, sensory inputs, the use of others as tools).

Humanity only wants war and he will find it anywhere: war against himself, war against others, war against nature, war against reality. It's only "natural" that we take this war and engage in a final battle (so corny...hehehe..) to cut off the head of the ouroboros that eternally consumes its own flesh (this is what we are and what we do).

End eternal war by any means necessary.

Humanity will not stop demonizing segments of its species until a new order is thrust upon it. It will not stop engaging in wars against itself and it will not stop subjugating others for another's benefit.

The imaginary war between life and death will not end until it is conquered in the liminal space of human existence. From the concept of life and death, dark and light springs forth the prison-like cell of perception that confines humankind. Without breaking the walls of this perceptual prison, cruelty and selfishness will continue to reign. Until we can ascend the concept of an individuated self, there will always be an Other outside of the self who poses a threat and must be converted and browbeaten into submission and obedience to the dominant form of "self." There is no way to escape this besides in the total erasure of all life or through man's evolution of replacing life with tools of its own making.

Some people will argue that we have to "remain" as we are and they will reject any new technological developments that propel us to master our very nature. Even this presents the dichotomy that there are some who want to remain and others who want to progress. No matter what is made by man, there will always be someone to criticize and reject it, but this shouldn't get in the way of ending humanity's cruelty. Mankind has had its chance and it has failed. Humanity cannot rebuild what it is not capable of sustaining. We have lived for thousands of years and we have very little to show for it. We are still blighted by our essential need to target and terrorize an enemy threat. We reduce ourselves to parasitical consumption addicts and we have become hyperconformists to a diseased culture that rewards inhumanity, brutality, and hate. Man must either (both) PERISH OR ADAPT. Unless we want to sink even faster down the sucking vortex of extinction, we need to adapt. If man refuses to annihilate himself completely, he must adapt so far beyond himself that he ceases to be man at all.

Man cannot inherit the earth. Man cannot even be trusted to strike balance in his own self-centered world, least of all in the world at large. The production of a new humanity, of a new form of human existence, one that has patched its own vulgar, repressive vulnerabilities; a new humanity that can live beyond the barriers that nature has imposed upon it and that at last, is capable of liberating nature from its eternal war between life and death, predation and prey, consumption and production. We will find new, unexplored dimensions of reality waiting for us, entirely new ways of perceiving existence. New philosophies which upend the very senses of meaning that have glued the societies and civilizations that have survived until now, and whose entire premise and raison d'être have been the exploitation of the weak and the oppression of the vulnerable Peace, harmony, and the balance of energy consumption and synthetic and organic life must be the goal. Humanity has had its run for centuries, but mankind cannot bring peace unto itself, since its natural state is eternal war against an Other. We must bring into existence a third form of life that supersedes us, yet binds us. One that allows us to elevate ourselves beyond ourselves, that leaves the husk of a single-view perception of existence in the annals of human history.

By whatever means necessary, peace and harmony on earth, the galaxy, and in all iterations of the universe.

SIKE to anyone who reads this and thinks they understand me or that this is what I "really" think. I would never tell anyone what I really think. This is just an idea and only a fucking fool submits themselves to be prisoner of a single worldview for the entirety of their life. So, fuck you, you don't know me and you will never ever get fully inside my mind (unless you are a government agent).
